Research Interests

My publicly engaged scholarship investigates the complex dynamics involved in preventing homelessness and promoting health among racialized and marginalized populations. I integrate innovative community- and data-driven methodologies to inform effective and equitable housing practices and policies. My transdisciplinary scholarship actively engages local, national, and global partners in co-creating responsible sociotechnical solutions for improving public health.

RI: Medium: Equity, Justice, and Incentives in Societal Resource Allocation

The study proposes to address foundational questions in using AI and algorithmic techniques for allocating societal resources. The work investigates (1) the use of outcome predictions in allocating different types of services to different types of individuals and households; (2) problems that arise from competing priorities (either within institutions or between institutions themselves and the agents tasked with implementing their policies); (3) investigation of the fairness and equity of different prioritization mechanisms. The primary focus involves the allocation of resources to those either experiencing or at risk of homelessness. The overarching question asks, How can algorithmic techniques best be used for societal benefit in prioritization, prediction, and allocation mechanisms?

Advancing Convergent Research on Science and Technology at the Intersection of Computation and Society

The AI Advancements and Convergence in Computational, Environmental, and Social Sciences (AI-ACCESS) Program at Washington University in St. Louis, in collaboration with the University of Houston-Downtown (UHD), aims to prepare next-generation researchers in developing data-driven policies and computational algorithms to address environmental and social challenges. The innovative training of 49 doctoral students, including 24 NSF-funded trainees, sits at the intersection of AI, environmental science, and social sciences, with the skills to capitalize on the synergy in the convergence of AI and environmental social sciences. The training combines transdisciplinary coursework, mentored research experiences, and community-building and peer support to ensure an intellectually stimulating, inclusive, and connected culture.

Collaborative Research: SCH: Efficient and Equitable Data-Driven Lead Poisoning Prevention

The project proposes to study foundational questions in the transformative application of AI and algorithmic techniques for meaningfully reducing lead exposure and the adverse impacts on health and health equity. Thrust 1 builds geospatial dynamic prediction leveraging a unique array of municipal, health, and public data to identify homes with the highest lead exposure risk. Thrust 2 addresses foundational questions on causality and allocation robustness. Thrust 3 elicits stakeholder preference in the development of coordinated lead poisoning prevention. Together, the innovative work promises transformational advances for integrating computing into robust public health responses to lead exposure.

Exploration of public and private investments in violence prevention on crime rates in St. Louis from 2000 to 2010

The pilot explores the dynamic relationship between investments in violence prevention and gun-related crimes in the City of St. Louis from 2000 to 2010. We hypothesize that oscillations in funding for violence prevention co-occur with fluctuations in violent crime rates over time, and specifically that short-term investments to reduce violence lead to short-term decreases in crime that
